Nigel Tomm

- Nigel Tomm was born in 1979 and is a professional experimental photographer who is known for creating distorted images that have been taken and then crumpled up to give this effect of it being almost destroyed, yet it still has really positive final look. This style of photography is contemporary as it has been made in modern times and used modern techniques, this is obvious by the first look at this type of photography as you can see that editing has been used and that it generally has more of a modern look. Tomm also uses non-traditional methods combined with the contemporary style of the actual images. This is clear as he uses modern cameras instead of something like a film camera which would be then categorized as traditional for photography. However he also uses methods such as crumpling the paper to get this effect on the images which could actually be defined as traditional as it is a style of collage

- 1. Screw/fold-up an image into an interesting 3D form and then draw/paint the new image to create an interesting composition
